My Journals

Real writers keep journals. I've had four.

When Mother told my sister Marilyn that I loved to write, she sent me a journal for my birthday. It was squarish and fat, with small organized pages. It had a shiny pink cover with MY DIARY written on it in scrolled, gold letters. A flimsy padlock, which would break if you looked at it, was supposed to keep it secret. Every page had two skimpy sections, with a date at the top of each. There was space enough for maybe three sentences if your handwriting was small. My handwriting scrawls. Besides, my life is too big to fit into those squinched-up pages. I gave it to my friend Lindsay Ross. She adores it. She has a smaller life. And tidy writing.

Then our teacher handed out "journals" which we had to write in every day for one month. She said she wouldn't mark them but she would read them over. I did it and, as assignments go, it wasn't bad. But, of course, you could only put down stuff that you wouldn't mind her knowing. My private life is not her affair. When I got it back, though, and saw that she had written Excellent! on it, I felt like a fraud.

Then Dad gave me a journal. It is elegant. The pages are creamy and feel like the best art paper when you stroke them. The outside is covered with a deep blue fabric which has tiny nose-gays scattered over it. I love it. Maybe, someday, my life will be elegant enough to match it. I hope so. I'm saving it carefully just in case.

My fourth journal I bought for myself. It is a hardcover book meant for writing lecture notes in it. It has lots of room on every page. Some days, I write six or seven full pages about what I am feeling and thinking. Or about Emily or school. Other days I don't even pick it up or, if I do, I just write something like "Another day lived through!" I draw pictures in it now and then or paste a copy of a poem I like.

Getting a journal is like buying shoes. You have to find the one that fits. And you are the only person who can tell if it pinches.
